Research on deterrence has shown a lot of interest on street crimes. There is a significant correlation between curfew laws and the reduction or deflection of deviant criminal activities. In other words, “ strict curfew enforcement follows deterrence theory, which argues that certain, swift, and severe punishments will cause juveniles to rationally weigh consequences and commit fewer criminal acts ”

Curfew Thesis 2 | Survey Methodology | Quantitative Research

Juvenile curfew laws have become a pervasive and popular strategy for controlling juvenile crime. Public opinion is solidly behind the use of curfews, and the primary basis for this support is the notion that curfews make streets safer. This article provides preliminary results from a systematic review of empirical research on juvenile curfews, concluding that the evidence does not support the argument that curfews prevent crime and victimization.
